Main areas of research and main scientific results

The lab investigates the molecular mechanisms of how cells control the intracellular communication, especially between the endoplasmic reticulum (ER) and the nucleus. The lab uses correlative live imaging with electron microscopy methodologies which enables visualizing cellular structures in situ at high temporal and spatial resolution, and combines it with quantitative live cell imaging and a microscopy-based loss-of-function screen.

In my postdoctoral research I established a novel correlative light and electron microscopy (CLEM) method and combined it with super-resolution microscopy. This “dynamic” nano-scale imaging approach allowed me to show for the first time that nuclear pores assemble via fundamentally different mechanisms in mitosis and interphase.
